Electing a new Pope

To elect a new Pope, there are several stages.

- 1. All of the Cardinals of the Roman Catholic Church meet in Rome (unless they are over 80). There can be a maximum of 120 Cardinals involved in the vote.
- 2. The Cardinals all take part in a public mass to ask for guidance from the Holy Spirit.
- 3. The Senior Cardinal issues the order Extra Omnes and all not involved in the election process have to leave.
- 4. The doors are then sealed shut and the CONCLAVE starts.

Eligo in Summum Pontificem

This is the voting slip used to elect a new Pope.

Each Cardinal will try to disguise their writing when they print the name of their choice.

They fold the card in half making it one inch wide.

The words on the top mean “I elect as supreme pontiff”.

All votes cast in the election are secret and must be destroyed immediately.

They are burnt in the small stove that is located in the Sistine chapel.

The colour of the smoke that comes from the chimney is what people watch for.

If the smoke from the chimney is black, another vote is needed.

If the smoke from the chimney is white, a new Pope has been elected. The great bells of St. Peter will also ring.

Once the new Pope has been elected, the chief Cardinal will come onto the balcony of St. Peter's Basilica and proclaim "Habemus Papam".

We have a pope!
